Market Review

The MSCI USA Small Cap Growth Index was up 2.4%, with Technology, Health Care, and Industrials sectors contributing the most. The biggest laggards during the month came in Consumer Discretionary, Financials, and Consumer Staples. From a factor standpoint beta again was far and away the best performer, while value-related and quality factors tended to lag. Amidst this, net of fees, the Fund outperformed the benchmark primary driven by strong stock selection in Industrials and, to a lesser extent, Financials. Offsetting this partially was weaker stock selection in Utilities, Technology, and Financials. Sector relative positioning was also a modest tailwind to relative performance, with much of the benefit stemming from the underweights to Consumer Staples and Materials and the overweight to Utilities.

Fund Review

At the stock level, the top three contributors to relative performance included Bloom Energy, Cameco, and BWX Technologies, while bottom relative detractors included Carvana, CommVault Systems, and Talen Energy. Bloom Energy provides a solution that turns natural gas and hydrogen into electricity as efficiently as gas turbines, but in small, clean, configurable modules that can be located anywhere there is a gas supply. During the month, the stock was up significantly on news Brookfield Asset Management would be investing up to $5B to build and power AI data centers using Bloom Energy's fuel cell technology. Cameco, the world's largest provider of Uranium, rose on news that the US government signed a pact with them (alongside Westinghouse and Brookfield) that will see at least $80B of new nuclear reactors constructed in the US to accelerate nuclear power and artificial intelligence deployment. BWX Technologies, a leading nuclear technology solutions provider serving government, military, and commercial needs, also benefitted performance during the period as sentiment around nuclear continued to improve. Turning to the biggest detractors in the month, Carvana, an online used car retailer that buys, sells, and finances cars, fell on the back of disappointing guidance which came amidst broader trends that have given investors pause more recently, such as rising auto delinquencies and the bankruptcy of two major suppliers in the auto parts industry. CommVault Systems helps clients restore data and operations following cyber incidents. The stock fell later in the month following weaker than expected results in part due to higher operating expenses and an acceleration in its software-as-a-service business, which carries a lower gross margin vs the overall business. Finally, Talen Energy, one of the largest power generation companies in North America, fell during the month.

Outlook

There wasn't anything particularly notable in terms of fundamental drivers, so the weakness more than likely is in part a give-back of some of the stocks' strong performance in the prior quarter. A core belief of ours is that change is the only constant. As such, we've designed a time-tested process around that core belief, seeking to understand change through the lens of 4 primary forces—1) competitive advantage, 2) strategy/management shifts 3) thematic forces and 4) cyclical business conditions—that impact earnings growth, which we believe is the ultimate driver of stock price performance. This process has served us well for more than 25 years and will continue to guide us in the future irrespective of the prevailing headlines of the day.
