Market Review

Global equities ended November broadly flat, balancing concerns about an AI-driven investment bubble, a less dovish Fed, and softening consumption against improving macro data and a solid earnings season. US earnings excluding mega-caps grew at the fastest pace in three years, while Europe showed early signs of recovery, with expectations for stronger 2026 growth amid better financial conditions. AI remained a key market catalyst but also a source of volatility, as questions emerged around sustainability and circular financing risks. Overall, sentiment stayed cautious but constructive, supporting a moderately positive outlook for equities. In Italy, equities performed well in November (+1%), supported by banks, and financial services, while valuations remain attractive at a 17% discount to Europe.

Fund Review

During the past month we did not add new positions to the portfolio, while we exited three holdings (Molting, NewPrinces, and Webuild) as their risk-reward profiles no longer met our criteria. Among the best performers, Salvatore Ferragamo stood out, supported by early signs of a potential revival in the luxury sector and by growing evidence that the company's long-awaited turnaround may finally be taking shape. After years of declining margins and weak brand heat, Ferragamo is showing the first tangible improvements: like-for-like sales turned positive, clienteling initiatives are gaining traction, and the brand narrative, centred around its cinematic heritage, is resonating more consistently across channels. According to recent research, product assortments, store visuals and a more coherent communication strategy are helping drive higher retail productivity, a critical variable given that underperformance in physical stores was one of the key contributors to the group's margin erosion over the past decade. From an investment perspective, Ferragamo remains a recovery story, but with increasing visibility. Analysts have recently upgraded the stock, arguing that the company may return to profitability in 2026 and that current valuation levels already discount significant pessimism. Although the group is still searching for both a CEO and CFO — a factor that may introduce execution volatility in the short term — the improving operating trends, stronger full-price sell-through, and the strategic appeal of the brand (including potential optionality from future M&A interest) support a more constructive outlook. In this context, Ferragamo's strong performance last month reflects both fundamental progress and renewed investor confidence in its ability to regain relevance within the luxury landscape.

Outlook

We continue to see a low probability of a "natural" U.S. recession, given the Fed's shift toward easing, the upcoming fiscal boost from the One Big Beautiful Bill, and further bank deregulation. Only a major market dislocation—such as a sharp rate spike or a systemic credit event—would likely trigger an economic contraction. The AI boom and rising global defense spending should further support growth through capex and energy-infrastructure investment, and we do not view current conditions as a bubble, as valuations remain reasonable and investments are funded largely by mega-cap cash flows. Investor sentiment remains cautious and market performance has broadened geographically and across factors. While lofty valuations limit the buffer against shocks, markets can still climb the wall of worry. Italy is expected to enter 2026 with gradually improving macro conditions. Equity valuations remain attractive relative to Europe, and the market should benefit from strong earnings momentum in banks and financials as well as improving visibility in industrials, offering a constructive backdrop for Italian risk assets heading into the year.
