Market Review

Global equity markets advanced in January despite heightened geopolitical noise and political theatrics, supported by resilient macro data, a solid start to the earnings season, and continued enthusiasm around AI. Commodity strength boosted Energy and Materials, while factor rotations favored cyclicals and small caps over quality growth. Volatility rose but remained contained, with risk assets largely shrugging off negative headlines. In Italy, equities delivered positive but more moderate gains, with mid-caps outperforming large caps, reflecting selective risk appetite and continued investor focus on value-driven opportunities.

Fund Review

We have made no significant changes to the portfolio, as we remain constructive on the key structural themes we are exposed to, notably defense, electrification, and European banks. In January, the Italian equity market broadly tracked global trends: Energy and Industrials benefited from heightened geopolitical tensions and rising commodity prices, while Luxury, Insurance, and Automotive underperformed amid sector rotations, FX headwinds, and profit-taking after last year's strong rally. Within this context, we continue to view Leonardo as a core and high-conviction holding. Leonardo is a leading European aerospace and defense group, with strong positions in helicopters, defense electronics, cyber security, and space. The investment case is underpinned by a structurally robust defense outlook, supported by rising European defense budgets, sustained geopolitical tensions, and renewed focus on strategic autonomy. In addition, the group is benefiting from a clear self-help strategy, focused on operational discipline, portfolio rationalization, and improved cash generation. We particularly appreciate Leonardo's improving free cash flow profile, enhanced visibility from a resilient order backlog, and its exposure to high-growth segments such as electronics, cyber, and space, where Europe is entering a new investment cycle. Strategic partnerships and selective M&A further strengthen its industrial positioning, while potential restructuring of non-core civil activities represents an additional upside lever. Despite the strong share price performance, we believe valuations remain attractive relative to European peers, especially in light of improving execution and medium-term earnings momentum.

Outlook

We remain constructive on equities as macro conditions continue to favor risky assets. Solid and potentially strengthening global growth, easing inflation toward central bank targets in 2026, and supportive financial conditions underpin earnings resilience. Fiscal tailwinds in the US and Europe, alongside a broadening AI-driven investment and productivity cycle, further support equity markets. While risks persist—particularly around rates, fiscal sustainability, and growth shocks, we view recession risk as low, reinforcing a selectively diversified equity allocation.
